After "Trying Them All," SpaNaturally Solved "All My Issues"

A 2001 expansion on Pam Pittman's Twin Cities home in 2001 included plans for a spa. Great idea, thought Pittman: relaxation in hot water and all of the comforts one expects from a spa. But then like most homeowners who have owned a spa, a well-known variety of unexpected challenges emerged once the new spa and addition were in place. She candidly put it this way, "The spa had every issue in the book, including sudsing" — which usually means the spa is full of biofilm, the bacterial colonies that grow and persist in any water environment and are hard to eradicate, even with chlorine and bromine.

Among the troublesome problems:

- Water clarity was usually cloudy
- pH was always a challenge
- Corrosion of the spa's pipes developed from regular chemical usage
- "That awful smell of chlorine and other chemicals in the rest of the house" persisted as long as the spa was in use

Like other spa owners who think they are getting a genuine luxury item in her house that turns out to be a real headache, Pittman then went through the motions of trying to cure these spa ills.

"I tried everything on the shelf and none of it seemed to work," she says. In other words, she kept throwing chemicals at chemicals. Then she saw a flyer for SpaNaturally at her spa dealer's shop and decided to give the all-natural remedy to clarify and condition water using a species of sphagnum moss.

The same moss that for eons has been keeping lakes clear and clean around the world—is now keeping Pam Pittman's home spa spic and span.

"It works!" exclaims the happy spa user. Since I started using SpaNaturally, I had zero issues with it and my water is clear, pH is easy to balance, there are no sudsing issues and my maintenance time is a lot less than before, plus the water feels so silky and soothing."

Pittman also likes the fact that the product is made by a Minnesota company, Creative Water Solutions (www.cwsnaturally.com): "I like buying local." Best of all, "all my issues" have all evaporated with the use of the moss.

"There no longer is a strong chemical smell in the house," she sighs happily, "let alone in the spa area:" At last, spa contentment delivered and all expectations met.
